National Physical Therapy Month

October is National Physical Therapy Month and we asked Ryan Mueller, PT, DPT, Neuro Logic Rehabilitation and Wellness, why people with Parkinson's benefit from PT. Read his answers below!

“Working with someone with Parkinson’s disease is not a cookie cutter approach and I am constantly reassessing and using my clinical judgement for what is right for the person in front of me.

Physical therapy is extremely important for someone with PD throughout his or her lifespan as function may fluctuate and we are the most skilled at addressing movement related symptoms. It also allows us to consistently see individuals and communicate with other care team members if changes begin to happen. Evidence continues to demonstrate the tremendous benefits of exercise for disease modification, neuroprotection, and addressing both motor and nonmotor symptoms, and who better to help create, develop, and modify a program than a PT with their patient and his or her family.”
