National Physical Therapy Month

October is National Physical Therapy Month with the 2024 theme being fall prevention. We interviewed Jamie Nesbit, PT, DPT, Creighton University, to learn more about the benefits of physical therapy for people with Parkinson's.

Fall prevention all is one of many ways that a physical therapist can help improve the quality of life for individuals with Parkinson disease. How is that done? A physical therapist would talk with you about your balance, falls and near falls and help identify balance exercises that would be best for you. They will also work on how to safely get up from the floor if recovering from a fall is needed.

How else can physical therapy benefit people with Parkinson? Physical therapists are movement experts who teach strategies to move more easily and complete daily activities throughout all stages of Parkinson disease. Physical therapists will provide exercises that can help improve and maintain mobility, quality of life and health. A Physical therapist will also work with you and your healthcare team to address any new symptoms that may arise.
